

Surprisingly, I crept like a lizard towards the nearest exit as I was fried by the heat that emitted relentlessly from the crackling fire. Frantically, I shook every worry that had previously creased my mind returned to haunt me: almost screaming in my ears; creating fear and worry. Eventually, I had plucked up the bravery to stride, swiftly coming to my unsteady feet. I was sure to set foot on those exquisite moon again. As I stepped out, I finally felt the relieving sensation of the cold breeze on my flushed face - I had finally escaped.

As the deepening crunch of frosted grass continued beneath my feet, my eyes were instantly drawn towards the immoral, wicked household which stood motionless behind me. Promptly, my head turned to the straggly canopy of darkened clouds that crept stealthily overhead. The once relieving moor began to crumble underneath me as I started to feel the effects of worry overwhelm me. My spine chilled. Would I ever see the light of the clear, sunny sky again?

Despite all of my short comings, there was more to come. I had soon spotted a shelter in the far distance - it was calling my name. Heavily, buckets of tears began to gush down from the sky as howling winds roared simultaneously with it. Futile, I darted towards its aristocratic entrance with a wide grin from ear to ear, just as I heard a rumble. Without warning, it shook the ground violently as two gaudy horns crumbled to their ultimate doom.

Convinced of my inevitable fall to enter the shelter, I pounced towards the mouth of the cave which was laying before me. Deceiving joyfully, the first step I took repeated for miles beyond what the ear could possibly capture. I was safe. Just as all hope was retrieved, each bit was slowly chipped away again as a ghostly figure pranced towards the opposite shadow of this secluded graveyard in which I stood. My shaky, weathered hand reached for my revolver, which usually resided in my pocket, but it had presumably slid through as I felt nothing but the gaping hole in it. "Re-reveal yourself," I yelled openly into the black void ahead.

Two luminous, neon yellow eyes peered into my view

①

②

askedart